Raised in the early days of the internet age, Christopher was practically born with a motherboard in one hand, and a hard drive in the other.

The son of a software developer, he built his first computer at the age of eight, and quickly moved to running his own website as a forum moderator.

After graduating high school, he pursued a career in web development for a time. But less code-based forms of work kept finding a way in, through his hobbies with raspberry pi projects, helping family members with the usual my-laptop-is-running-slow problems, tinkering with Linux, virtual boxes, servers, and more. In 2017 he was hired for his first job in the IT field, where his interest in the career grew to the business that it is today.

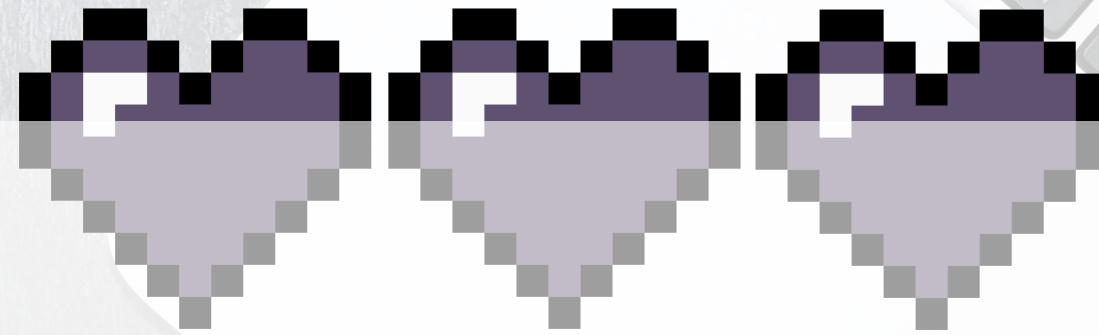

In his spare time he likes complaining about the state of modern MMOs and long romantic walks down Best Buy isles with his wife.
